Henry Harris, a well-to-do cigarmaker, boarded with Mrs. Kern's parents and an attachment sprang up between them. It culminated in a marriage engagement and Sunday was fixed for the wedding ceremony.

The bride-elect's trosseau was delivered to-day, and Mrs. Kern took much pleasure in trying on the pretty gowns.

While garbed in her wedding finery she made excuses to send her parents and her sister from her for a while.

When the family returned Mrs. Kern lay lifeless on a couch with the empty acid bottle by her side. She had been dead some minutes.

Harris, to whom she was engaged, is almost crazed at his flencee's deed.
